ball game: was guest of honor at several luncheons, attended a symphony concert with her mother, with whom, also; she went to see Forbes-Robertson in "The Third Floor Back," and shared the honor of being the guest par excellence at a tea given by the wife of her father's college chum and friend of many years—Mrs, John Hays Hammond. The latter event was a charming affair and served the triple purpose of being Mrs, Hammond's initial entertainment of the season, when her friends called to welcome her back to Washington and congratulate her over the improved health of her distinguished husband, which until lately threatened to cause the family's temporary withdrawal from society; to introduce to society her nieces, Miss May Hammond and Miss Eliza Morgan McMullin, and to compliment the White House debutante.

As has been suggested, dates are rapidly filling for Washington's last floral exhibit of the season—the much discussed and long planned display of the choice blossoms of the home. And such a bouquet as it assembled! a kind of "afternoon blooming series, with a fringe of last season's flowers, looking as fresh as when they, too, were buds.

Foremost in the bunch will be the carefully cultivated White House bud, who was born in the Buckeye State of the Union, reared in the Orient, and brought to her present perfection of young womanhood under the combined influences of college life in Pennsylvania and summer pleasures in Massachusetts, with an occasional breath of the official air of Washington; an ambassadorial bud from sunny Italy, lately nurtured in the shadow of the snow-capped hills of Switzerland, to which country her father was the Italian minister pleninotentiary before his transfer to Washington this month; another diplomatic bud is Miss Helena Villegas, of far-off Argentina; and a scant half-hundred Americanborn, though European-finished buds whose blooming into the social world of their forobears will occupy the attention of the haut monde for weeks to come.

Miss Helen Taft, the star bud around whom the other debutantes will cluster, will be presented to society at a ton given by her mother on the afternoof of December 1, with the historic White House as a setting. The occasion will be a memorable one, for not only will the future belies of officialdom be there in all the glory of their newest Parisian finery, but the diplomatic corps will call en masse to greet in her twn home, for the first time this season, the President's wife, whose physical ability to resume the social obligations of her position, is indicated by this and other plans for her daughter's first season.
